Luchino Visconti's first feature film, it is considered by many to be the first Italian neorealist film, though there is some debate about whether such a categorization is accurate.

Ossessione is a key work of Italian cinema, cited by writers such as Marcia Landy as the first work of Italian Neo-Realism (rather than the more frequently cited Rome, Citta Aperta). It is also a European work that is influenced by James M Cain's classic slice of roman-noir, The Postman Always Rings Twice- which would also influence Camus's L ...

Ossessione's bleak worldview was a flagrant challenge to the Fascist vision of Italy during this period. In this context, Ossessione faced great distribution and exhibition obstacles, with the Fascists at one point even cutting and destroying prints of the film.

Ossessione is a curious beast, a 40's noirish melodrama with elements of neorealism. The latter is what makes it unusually sympathetic - but it can potentially make the film drag. I watched it with fairly poor picture and sound quality and if it had been a better version...

Speaking of Bava, Image's DVD of Ossessione comes from Alfredo Leone, who's been the DVD-producing source for many of the Image Mario Bava Collection releases. Savant's read only second-hand the information that Ossessione was a film destroyed by the Italian Fascists, and that only secondary source materials now exist, and was expecting a print as ragged and gloomy as what showed on Los ...

Ossessione (1976) Acknowledged as the first film of the Italian neo-realist movement, Ossessione (Obsession) (1942) was also the remarkably assured directorial debut of Luchino Visconti. Loosely based on James M. Cain's 1934 novel The Postman Always Rings Twice, with the setting moved from California to Italy's Po Valley, Ossessione is a dark melodrama of adultery, murder and betrayal.
